MISCELLANEOUS READING.

A MAN WITH TOO MUCH MONEY Many will recollect that eccentric Englishman, Sir William Don, who played engagements at all our principal theatres, a few years since. He once possessed a princely fortune, but wasted it all by his extravagance. Strange to say, he was not inclined to be dissipated, but appeared to be entirely wrapped up in conceiving plans by which he might get rid of his money. His wealth actually became a burden almost impossible for him to bear. During market days in Dresden, many booths and stalls are filled with pottery, porcelain, and china ware of every kind, which are offered for sale. Some of these manufactures are exceedingly expensive .-Early in the morning, when the market was crowded with purchasers, Sir William would mount a fine blood-horse, take with him a groom, who was also mounted, and, pushing such terms that cannot fail to give satisfaction.
